CULTURAL AWARENESS AND SUCCESSFUL INTERCULTURAL COMMUNICATION

By D. BAKR BAGASH MANSOUR AL-SOFI

In today's world, modernization has increased human mobility and extended contacts with people from different cultures. In other words, intercultural communication has become one obvious feature of globalization. Zhang (2011) confirms that "people have differences in cultural backgrounds, living patterns, educational, political and economic conditions, even hobbies and characters, so there exists all kinds of problems and difficulties in intercultural communication. Misunderstanding occurs when behaviour is considered appropriate in one culture and inappropriate in the other. Considering this issue, people have become increasingly aware of the need to be culturally aware of other people' behaviours and their cultures. No one can overlook the inseparability of language and culture and the importance of both for successful communication. At the same time, language competence as a prerequisite and cornerstone of intercultural communication cannot be ignored, but it is not sufficient for successful intercultural communication. Successful intercultural communication involves more than linguistic fluency or competencies. Cultural fluency including a range of other skills, attitudes and knowledge associated with multilingual and multicultural communication are needed as well. These skills, attitudes and knowledge have been called intercultural awareness. Moreover, sometimescultural differences that lead to misunderstanding and conflict are not tolerable and matter more than linguistic differences.

In the context of cultural awareness and before plunging into understanding it, communicators should recognize what culture refers to. For this purpose, culture is a general term that is —difficult to define (Samovar, Porter & McDaniel, 2010, p. 23) since there are countless ways to define it. There is a large body of literature on culture and it may not be an exaggeration to say that the number of the definitions of culture is equal to the number of the scholars themselves in that everyone has his/her own way of defining it, depending on the research field and the purpose of that research. The simple definition of culture is that it is a complete way of life and "software of the mind" (Hofstede, Hofstede, G. J. & MINKOV, 2012). More important, the question that is raised is not what culture is, but what culture does when communicating with people from other cultures. In its broadest sense, culture is a set of beliefs, values, norms, customs, traditions, attitudes, and behaviours that are transformed from one generation to another and that distinguish one group from the others. According to Samovar and Porter (2003), culture is —the deposit of knowledge, experience, beliefs, values, attitudes, meanings, social hierarchies, religion, notions of time, roles, spatial relationships, concepts of the universe, and material objects and possessions acquired by a group of people in the course of generations through individual and group striving. They consider culture to be developed in the course of generations and relate it to the common history. Furthermore, it supposes that culture is acquired through an enculturation process (i.e., not inherited).

In view of the fact that there are numerous definitions of culture, the characteristics come into play. Samovar, Porter, and Stefani (1998) identify many characteristics of culture in that it is learned, transmitted from generation to generation, based on symbols, subject to change, integrated, ethnocentric, and adaptive. These characteristics are at the core of the term 'culture'. For successful communication, it is crucial to be aware of these indisputable characteristics.

Culture cannot be ignored in the field of intercultural communication since it has a pervasive influence on the communication process. It shapes behaviours, perceptions, attitudes, and in general, ways of life. Therefore, it seems reasonable to make the most of culture, as it is one of the vital components of intercultural communication. It is not surprising to find that people from different cultures have their own cultural perceptions, beliefs, values and social customs that greatly determine their communicative way. In this regard, realizing that our cultural backgrounds shape all is the first step in cultural awareness. According to JANDT (2004), intercultural communication —requires understanding dominant cultural values and understanding how our own cultural values affect the way we perceive others and ourselves. Intercultural communication is of a great value to every individual who aspires to be successful, particularly for those who work in different international contexts in that it can establish productive contacts and reduce misunderstandings.

Individualism–collectivism dimension refers to the extent a culture values individual autonomy as opposed to collective teamwork. People in collectivistic cultures are mostly known by their group or family names and not necessarily by their personal achievements, whereas people in individualistic cultures are mostly defined by their own personal accomplishments. Individualistic cultures encourage their members to become unique individuals; hierarchal power and status differences are minimized, while equality is emphasized. Collectivistic cultures stress the needs of a group; individuals are identified more through their group affiliation than by individual position or attributes. In individualistic cultures, —people are supposed to look after themselves and their immediate family only, while in collectivistic cultures, —people belong to groups or collectivities, which are supposed to look after them in exchange for loyalty. This denotes that people in individualistic cultures think of themselves and their own benefits. Their life is a kind of competition, while collectivistic people's life as a kind of cooperation with other in group persons. Individualism values self-reliance, equality, and autonomy of the individual, while collectivism values group effort and harmony.
